Comments: Eastern Oregon forests are on the verge of disappearing without active forest management and wildfire prevention. They are overstocked, not well managed, and left to burn year after year. Thoughtful management plans need to be implanted to bring the forest back to historical conditions. This needs to be done through commercial logging activities along with science based forest management. For too many years the forests east of the cascades have been managed under a no touch mentality with fire being the answer to solve all problems. Fire is nothing but a monster money grab from contractors who do nothing to stop it and only encourage its destruction to enrich their pockets, starting with the federal government employees. Their only incentive is to have the longest fire season as possible so money trickles into their budgets and they can milk their existence into being needed. It's not called the fire service, it's the forest service. Act like it!
