Comments: The Lolo National Forest matters to me. I have never been to Montana, but it is on my list of places to go. One of these days, I hope to have visited every National Park and National Forest out there, and I cannot do that if the administration continues to gut and destroy everything they touch. What matters most: the Forest Service should NOT be able to sell off public lands, because once public land is disposed of, it cannot return easily to public ownership. This is the people's land, and the people deserve a say in what happens to it. The Forest Service is full of people who are only here to make as much money for mega-billionaires as they can, and we the people will never see a single cent of the blood money that is extracted from the public lands that belong to all of us. If this goes through, everything will be lost. Removing any land from the public forests removes the public estate that Americans have a right to access and enjoy. Disposal of the National Forest Lands should require a compelling public benefit, not just "administrative convenience" or "this will make the rich people richer than they already are." These lands are OUR lands, and we will not give up the fight for them.
